I. Overview of the history and development of the federal system in Venezuela

Venezuela was the first Latin American country to gain independence from the Spanish Crown in 1810. A general congress of representatives of the former colonial provinces of the Capitanía General de Venezuela enacted on 21 December 1811 the Federal Constitution for the States of Venezuela, the first constitution on the South American continent. This Constitution followed the general principles of modern constitutionalism derived from the North American and French Revolutions, such as the republican system; supremacy of the constitution paired with constitutional judicial control; organic separation of powers; territorial distribution of power; declaration of fundamental rights. The 1811 Constitution established a federal form of government.\(^1\)

Venezuela was thus the second country after the United States of America to adopt a federal system, which enabled the construction of an independent state that united the former colonial provinces. Today, the territory of the republic is divided into 24 states, a Capital District (that covers parts of the city of Caracas), and federal dependencies that comprise the islands located in the Caribbean Sea. The municipalities with jurisdiction in Caracas are organized in a Metropolitan District (Distrito Metropolitano).

After a period of integration into Simón Bolívar’s Greater Colombia as of 1821, the “State of Venezuela” re-emerged as a separate country in 1830 with a rather mixed (centralized-provincial) form of government, but lived intense struggles between the central region and provincial forces. This period ended three decades later with a five-year “Federal War” (1858-1863), from which the Federation re-emerged with the establishment of the United States of Venezuela (1864). From that moment on, the form of government in Venezuela has always been federal, at least on the paper. During the second half of the 19th Century, successive civil wars lead to various constitutional reforms in which the federal system of government was kept, yet with a progressive tendency of centralization regarding numerous elements that have historically characterized the federal system. For instance, regarding unification of laws, the states accepted in the 1864 Constitution, as part on the “Basis of the Union”, “to have for all of them one same substantive legislation on criminal and civil matters”,\(^2\) to which in 1881 the “the same laws on civil and criminal procedure” were added.\(^3\) Accordingly, the Civil, Criminal, and Commercial Codes, but also the Codes of Civil and Criminal Procedure have always been federal laws.

During the first half of the 20th Century, dominated by autocratic regimes, Venezuela saw a continued process of centralization in the fields of military, administration, taxation and legislation. The territorial distribution of power and territorial autonomy of the component states had almost disappeared, in spite of the constitutions’ continuing formal proclamation of federalism. The second half of the 20th Century was characterized by democratization, especially under the constitution of 1961, which upheld the federal form of government, albeit with highly centralized powers at the national level. A political decentralization process sparked by the democratic practice began in 1989 with the transfer of powers from the central government to the federal states. For the first time since the 19th Century, the governors of the federal states were elected directly, and regional political life began to play an important role in the country.

---

2 Article 13 n° 22 Constitución de los Estados Unidos de Venezuela of 22 April 1864.

3 Article 13 n° 19 Constitución de los Estados Unidos de Venezuela of 27 April 1881.

Hugo Chávez, a former military officer whose coup d’état had failed in 1992 and who was elected as the President of the Republic in 1998, convened a National Constituent Assembly which sanctioned today’s Constitution which was submitted to a referendum in 1999. This 26th Constitution of Venezuela – instead of undertaking the changes that were needed for reinforcing democracy, namely the effective political decentralization of the federation and the reinforcement of state and municipal political powers – has caused the pendulum to swing back to, and to reinforce the centralization process.

II. Federal Distribution and Exercise of Lawmaking Powers

1. Areas of law subject to (legislative) jurisdiction of the central authority

   a. Matters attributed to the central government

Article 156 of the Constitution of 1999 enumerates all the areas of jurisdiction of the Poder Público Nacional, i.e. the central public power in Venezuela. As regards the legislative jurisdiction, Article 165 n° 32 explicitly provides that the central authority has jurisdiction for the legislation in the areas of

   • constitutional rights, obligations and guarantees;*

---

4 See also J. de Galindez, “Venezuela: New Constitution”, 3 American Journal of Comparative Law 81-82 (1954): “Only in theory does Venezuela continue to be a federal republic”.
6 For the political background of this decentralization reform and its impact on the political scene in Venezuela see M. Penfold-Becerra, “Federalism and Institutional Change in Venezuela”, in: Edward L. Gibson, Federalism and Democracy in Latin America 197-225 (Baltimore 2004). See also below Point II.2.a.
• civil law, commercial law, criminal law, the penal system, procedural law and private international law;*
• electoral law;*
• expropriations for the sake of public or social interests;*
• public credit;*
• intellectual, artistic, and industrial property;*
• cultural and archeological treasures;*
• agriculture;*
• immigration and colonization;7*
• indigenous people and the territories occupied by them;*
• labor and social security and welfare;8*
• veterinary and phytosanitary hygiene;9*
• notaries and public registers;*
• banks and insurances;*
• lotteries, horseracing, and bets in general;*
• the organization and functioning of the organs of the central authority and the other organs and institutions of the State.10*

Article 156 n° 32 also specifies that the central authority also has legislative jurisdiction for all matter of “national competence”, i.e. for the implementation of all other matters enumerated in Article 156 n°s 1-31. In this list, the power to legislate is explicitly attributed to the central authority for the following matters:11

• those related to the armed forces (n° 8)* and civil protection (n° 9);12
• monetary policies (n° 11);*

---

7 See also Article 156 n° 4: “the naturalization and the admission, extradition and expulsion of foreigners”; see also Article 38.
8 See also Article 156 n° 22: “the regime and organization of the social security system”.
9 See also Article 156 n° 23: “the legislation in matters of … public health [and] food safety…”
10 See also Article 156 n° 31: “the national organization and administration of justice, the Ministerio Público and the Defensoría del Pueblo”.
11 See TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 565 of 15 April 2008, file n° 07-1108, where the Supreme Tribunal interpreted the word “regimen” found in some of the provisions in Article 156 as indicating the power to legislate.
12 See also Articles 328-332.
• the coordination and harmonization of the different taxation authorities; the definition of principles, parameters, and restrictions, and in particular the types of tributes or rates of the taxes of the states and municipalities; as well as the creation of special funds that assure the inter-territorial solidarity (n° 13);
• foreign commerce and customs (n° 15);*
• mining and natural energy resources (hydrocarbon);¹³* fallow and waste land;
and the conservation, development and exploitation of the woods, grounds, waters,¹⁴ and other natural resources of the country (n° 16);¹⁵
• standards of measurement and quality control (n° 17);*
• the establishment, coordination, and unification of technical norms and procedures for construction, architecture, and urbanism, as well as the legislation on urbanism (n° 19);*
• public health, housing, food safety, environment,¹⁶ water, tourism,¹⁷ and the territorial organization (n° 23);
• navigation and air transport, ground transport, maritime and inland waterway transport (n° 26);¹⁸
• post and telecommunication services and radio frequencies (n° 28);*
• public utilities such as especially electricity, potable water, and gas (n° 29).¹⁹

Furthermore, the Constitution attributes to the central authority the powers to:

• conclude, approve, and ratify international treaties (Article 154)*;
• legislate on antitrust and the abuse of market power (Articles 113 and 114)*.

---

¹³ For the exclusive nature of central authority’s legislative power over the natural energy resources see in more detail the text accompanying note 35 below.
¹⁴ See also Article 304, which provides that all waters are property of the Republic and that the law establishes the necessary provisions in order to guarantee their protection, exploitation, and recovery.
¹⁵ Contrast with n° 23 (environment and water in the context of public health, housing and food safety).
¹⁶ See also the concurrent power in this area of the municipalities, Article 178 n° 4.
¹⁷ For the concurrent nature of this power see TSJ Sala Constitucional decision n° 826 of 16 May 2008, file n° 08-0479.
¹⁸ See also Article 156 n° 23: “the national policies and the legislation in matters of navigation”.
¹⁹ See Article 164 n° 8, which attributes “exclusive” power to the states for “the creation, regulation, and organization of public utilities of the states”.

b. Nature of the jurisdiction attributed to the central government

The Constitution does not expressly specify whether the central authority has exclusive powers in these areas or whether the legislative powers are shared with the component states and the municipalities. The exclusive character of legislative powers has to be determined by interpretation. On this basis, all of the areas of “general legislation” enumerated in Article 156 n° 32 can be considered to be of the exclusive power of the central authority, together with those other areas mentioned above that are marked with an asterisk (*), or those others where the central authority has already legislated. Neither the component states nor their municipalities may legislate in these areas. In all other areas that belong to the concurrent powers shared between the central government and the component states and their municipalities, the central authority always retains the power to enact “basic” laws (“leyes de base”), while establish the framework that must be respected by the local “laws of development” (“leyes de desarrollo”) enacted by the component states, Article 165(1).

Article 156 can be considered the most important constitutionally specified source authorizing central government regulation. Consequently, all important areas of government, in practice-based terms, are covered by central legislation. In summary, it seems fair to say that the central authority has legislative jurisdictions in all areas of law, either exclusively or in the form of framework laws.

2. Areas of law remaining (legislative) jurisdiction of the component states

a. Overview

Article 164 enumerates a list of matters that are formally designated as being of the “exclusive jurisdiction” of the component states. This is, however, misleading since

---

21 See, e.g., for the exclusivity of the federal jurisdiction for matters related to retirement and pensions on the basis of Article 156 n° 32, TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 518 of 1 June 2000, file n° 00-0841; decision n° 1452 of 3 August 2004, file n° 02-2585.
22 See also Exposición de Motivos de la Constitución (the official justification of the 1999 Constitution): “As regards to the concurrent powers, the Constitution adopts the experience of comparative law on decentralization and it provides that national laws have the nature of basic laws, in which general, basic, and guiding concepts are laid down; and that state laws are laws developing these basic principles, which allows for better conditions for the delimitation of competences”.
none of these matters can be regarded as truly “exclusive”, especially not as concerns the legislative powers.

Article 164 partially integrates the provisions of the “Decentralization Law” of 1989, which already provided for the transfer of powers to the states. But different from Article 164 of the 1999 Constitution, Article 11 of the Law of 1989 still provided explicitly that the states would have the power to legislate on these matters. With the entry into force of the 1999 Constitution, the pretensions of the states to legislate in the areas of their “exclusive” powers have been rejected and made dependent on national legislation. The constitutional provision in Article 158 which establishes that decentralization is a national policy has been ignored by the central government and the “Decentralization Law”, despite having been reenacted with virtually no changes (despite the discrepancies with the 1999 Constitution) in 2003, can be considered “dead letter”.

b. Nature of the jurisdiction attributed to the component states

The only true legislative power of the component states is to organize their own constitutional structure by adopting their own constitutions (Article 164 n° 1) “in accordance with this [federal] Constitution”. This provision limits this power of self-organization, since the federal constitution imposes a general organizational structure on of the component states and establishes uniform rules for the state governors (Articles 159 to 163 and 166).

25 Article 11, sole paragraph, of the Law of 1989 reads: “Until the states assume these powers through specific legislation, enacted by the respective legislative assemblies, the presently existing legislation continues in force.”
26 See, e.g., Dictamen de la Procuraduría de la República, Oficio N° D.A.G.E. 000019 of 20 October 2000, available at <http://www.pgr.gob.ve/PDF/Dictamanes/CONSTITUCIONAL1.pdf>, which rejects the possibility that the states establish the legislative basis for the conservation, administration and exploitation of the national highways on the basis of Article 164 n° 10, suggesting that, until a national law is enacted, the states and the federal government should conclude cooperation agreements.
29 Cf. TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision 1182 of 11 October 2000, file nº 00-1410: “It is therefore clear that the states are constitutionally privileged by the principle of autonomy for the organization of their from establishing themselves, in their respective state constitutions, the rules of organization and functioning of their legislative assemblies, which are governed by a federal law of the central authority (Article 162 in fine);\textsuperscript{30} as well as the basic legislation on public Administration and public servants which have also been enacted by the central authority.\textsuperscript{31} The only exclusive legislative powers remaining with the component states thus concern the specific legislation on the details of the organization and functioning of the governors’ office and states’ administrative organization.\textsuperscript{32} The two other items of Article 164 which make reference to legislative powers by referring to the component states’ right to enact a “régimen”, which could be understood as conferring legislative powers,\textsuperscript{33} are:

- the exploitation of non-metallic minerals that are not reserved to the central authority, salt mines and oyster beds (n° 5);
- the public utilities of the component states (n° 8).

The first of these two areas is – despite the being declared an “exclusive power” of the component states by Article 164 – overwhelmingly only a concurrent power, since the central authority retains the power over “the mines and natural energy resources (hydrocarbon) … and the conservation, development and exploitation of the … grounds … and the other natural treasures” according to Article 156 n° 16.\textsuperscript{34} It follows from this provision, read in conjunction with Article 164 n° 5, that especially the exploitation of natural energy resources (hydrocarbon) – i.e. gas and petrol, the \textsuperscript{30} Ley Orgánica de los Consejos Legislativos de los Estados, G.O. Nº 37.282 13 September 2001.

\textsuperscript{31} Ley Orgánica de la Administración Pública, G.O. Nº 37.305 of 17 October 2001; Ley del Estatuto de la Función Pública, G.O. Nº 37.522 of September 6, 2002.
\textsuperscript{32} Cf. Brewer-Carias (note 20 above) 27.
\textsuperscript{33} For the meaning of “régimen” in the constitutional catalogues of jurisdictions see note 11 above.
\textsuperscript{34} This constitutional provision thus undermines Article 11 n° 2 of the 1989 Decentralization Law (note 24 above), which provided that “in order to promote the administrative decentralization and according to the provision of Article 137 of the Constitution [of 1961] the following matters are transferred to the exclusive jurisdiction of the States: … the legislation, administration and exploitation of stones for construction and decoration or of any type other than precious … of the earthy substances, the salt-mines and the pearl producing oyster banks”.

dominant source of income of Venezuela – are subjected to the legislation enacted by the central authority. Only the administrative procedures for the exploitation of non-precious stone, salt mines and oyster beds thus seem to fall under a genuine exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the states. Also the second of the areas enumerated above (public utilities) is also merely a shared competence, since Article 156 n° 29 provides that the “general legislation” on the public utilities (at least those offered to the citizens at home) falls within the power of the central authority.

In summary, there are not relevant areas of law that are reserved exclusively to states. If at all, they only have exclusive administrative powers in some areas. The states dispose merely of concurrent powers for some few areas in which they may enact legislation (see those items not marked with an asterisk (*) above II.1). In any event, any state legislation in matters of concurrent powers in the form of “development laws” is dependent on the prior enactment of federal “basic laws” (Article 165(1)) which set the framework for the former. According to Article 165(1), such federal framework laws have to respect the principles of interdependency, coordination, cooperation, shared responsibility and subsidiarity. Yet this will not prevent the federal authority 35 The total control of the central authority over gas and petrol resources is complemented by Article 156 n°16(3), which provides that a federal law will establish a system of special economic attributions to the states in whose territory the exploited resources are found, yet without prejudice to the possibility to also establish special attributions in favor of other states, which means that the central authority has broad discretion in its decisions regarding at least gas and petrol.

36 For the exclusivity of the jurisdiction over salt mines, albeit only in a conflict between a state and a municipality see TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 78 of 30 January 2001, file n° 00-1556 (“una competencia originaria de los [Estados] … una competencia natural y exclusive”). For such a state law see Ley de Régimen, Administración y Aprovechamiento de Salinas y sus Productos del Estado Sucre, Gaceta Oficial Extraordinaria del Estado Sucre nº 10 of 29 November 1993.

38 See also Article 15 of the Ley orgánica de los Consejos Legislativos de los Estados, G.O. 37282 of 13 September 2001, whose enumeration of the powers of the state parliaments, other than the power to enact and amend a state constitution and (restricted) budgetary laws, essentially mentions only the legislative power to enact “development laws” within the framework of federal “basic laws”.

39 For a case in which a state claimed to be unable to legislate on matters of concurrent powers because the National Assembly had not yet enacted the necessary federal laws see TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 3203 of 25 October 2005, file n° 02-2984. See also A.R. Brewer-Carias, “Centralized Federalism in Venezuela”, 629, 639 (2005).

40 Cf. TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision 843 of 11 May 2004, file n° 03-1236, where the Supreme Tribunal affirms obiter that “the concurrent powers … have to be previously delimited by a basic national law; … only the national legislator has the power for enacting basic regulatory laws (according to the principles of interdependency, coordination, shared responsibility and subsidiarity) in the areas of concurrent powers”; this is reaffirmed in TSJ of 15 April 2008 (note 11 above) on the relation between Articles 156 n° 26 and 164 n° 10 regarding highways.
from also regulating specific details, at least as long as such detailed federal regulation can be justified under the principle of subsidiarity, i.e. if a need for centralized and thus uniform legislation can be shown. Articles 164 and 165(1) therefore only guarantee the states a kind of minimum core of legislative power in the areas of shared competences which must be respected by the central authority. 41 This minimum core is rather restricted in the light of the constitutional case law which tends to interpret the powers of the central authority broadly. 42

3. Allocation of residual powers

In line with the previous constitutions, the 1999 Constitution generally allocates residual powers with the states by disposing in Article 164 n° 11 that the states have “exclusive” powers “for everything that, according to this Constitution, is not allocated to the national or municipal power”. This general residual power is, however, undermined by two inverse attributions of residual power to the central authority. Article 156 n° 12 grants the central authority full control over all “other taxes, excises, and revenues not attributed to the states or the municipalities by this Constitution or the law”. Furthermore, Article 156 n° 33 provides for the jurisdiction of the central authority “in all other matters that correspond to it [the federal government] due to their nature or kind”. This provision has been copied from the 1961 Constitution, which was intended as an implicit powers clause in favor of the federal government. 43 The federal government’s power is further strengthened by the Supreme Tribunal’s willingness to

---

41 See, e.g., TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 2495 of 19 December 2006, file n° 02-0265 where the State of Carabobo claimed that Article 42 of the Ley General de Puertos (G.O. n° 73589 of 11 December 2002) violated its powers resulting from Article 164 n° 10 of the Constitution (which grants states the “exclusive” powers for the conservation, administration, and exploitation of commercial ports “in coordination with the national government”) because the federal law obliges the States either to established an autonomous entity for the administration of each port or to grant concession to private entities for that task; this was rejected by the Supreme Tribunal, which interpreted Article 164 n° 10 as conferring merely concurrent powers, with the argument that such obligation is “justified” (it follows from the preceding discussion of federalism in general that this justification is made with regards to the principle of subsidiarity, although it is not specifically invoked) “by the general interest, which the Republic has to protect, in the effective and also efficient administration of decentralized public services… The reservation of the administration to a specialized entity safeguards that services are rendered optimally and it is in this line of reasoning that said provision is justified.”

42 See note 44 below and note 26 above, and also Point IV.1.a below.

accept inherent powers in favor of the national level. In summary, the general residual power allocated to the states is a rather theoretical one. In practice, it seems that – in case of doubt - the presumption in favor of federal powers will virtually always prevail.

4. Conflicts between central and component state law

As mentioned above, the component states do not have any exclusive legislative powers. Any legislative activity by the states can thus only take place within the framework established by the “basic laws” (leyes de base) (Article 165) that must have been enacted by the central government prior to the state’s legislation. By definition, these central “basic laws” must be superior to the state laws, since the latter have to remain within the framework of the former. Accordingly, in case of conflict between federal law and state law, the former will prevail. The only – rather theoretical – hypothesis in which a state law could prevail over a federal law is when it can be shown that the central government did not respect the constitutional limits to its legislative powers, such as in particular the principle of subsidiarity of Article 165(1).

5. Law-making powers of municipalities

44 Cf. TSJ Sala Constitucional 15 April 2008 (note 11 above) although explicitly only for administrative jurisdiction: “This [assumption an implicit general power or general clause of public order allowing to condition, limit, or intervene the rights or liberties] is possible on the basis of the doctrine of inherent or implicit rights … which allows … to revise the spirit of the provision attributing powers in such manner as to accept the existence of a power when this is the logical consequence of the legal provision and of the nature of the main activity exercised by the organ or entity.”
45 A.R. Brewer-Carias, La Constitución y sus Enmiendas 28 (Caracas 1991); A.R. Brewer-Carias, “El Sistema Constitucional Venezolano”, in D. Garcia Belaunde et al. (eds.), Los Sistemas Constitucionales Iberoamericanos 771, 778 (Madrid 1992); Rosenn (note 37 above) 16; see also J.M. Serna de la Garza, “Constitutional Federalism in Latin America”, 30 Cal. W. Int’l L.J. 277, 286 (2000): “the peculiar manner in which implicit powers have been understood, has created an additional instrument that can be used by the federal government to expand its powers”.
46 See text accompanying note 39 above.
47 See, e.g., TSF Sala Constitucional, decision n° 1495 of 1 August 2006, file n° 05-2448 in which the Supreme Tribunal, upon request by the national Defensoría del Pueblo (Ombudsman) suspended temporarily the Ley de Defensa y Seguridad Ciudadana of the State of Zulia, G.O. of the State of Zulia n° 659 (extraordinario) of 24 May 2004, due to the potential incompatibility with the Código Orgánico de Procedimiento Penal and the constitutional guarantees of freedom by allowing police forces to arrest suspect persons for 48 hours; a final decision is not yet published. For the legal analysis of constitutionality by the Defensoría del Pueblo see <http://www.defensoria.gob.ve/detalle.asp?sec=160104&id=110&plantilla=1>.
48 See text accompanying notes 40-42.
According to Article 178 “[t]he powers of the Municipality are the governance and the administration of its interests and the management of the matters attributed to it by this Constitution and the national laws with respect to local life.” For such purpose, Article 174 provides that the government and administration of the municipalities is attributed to the mayors; and Article 175 assigns the legislative function to the Consejos Municipales (municipal councils), which they exercise through “municipal laws” in the form of ordenanzas in the matters attributed to it in Article 178.49 These “own” areas of the municipalities are, according to Article 178, matters related to urbanism, historic monuments, social housing, local tourism, public space for recreation, construction, local transport, public entertainment, local environmental protection and hygiene, local public utilities, funerals, child care and other community matters. Only the matters related to local public events (n° 3) and funerals (n° 6) can be regarded as exclusive powers of the municipalities, while the other areas are concurrent and thus limited to the framework of federal and state laws.50 According to the Law on Municipalities of 2005, the lack of federal legislation (and by logic extension also of state legislation) is supposedly no obstacle to the legislative activity of the municipalities in concurrent matters.51

However, it has to be pointed out that the Municipality as the “primary political unit of the national organization” (Article 168) has been virtually rendered moot by the creation in 2006 of a parallel structure of Consejos Comunales (“communal” councils), which are elected by local “assemblies of the citizens”, Asamblea de Ciudadanos y Ciudadanas, which can be formed by interested citizens. These Asambleas de Ciudadanos y Ciudadanas have been attributed jurisdiction to “approve the rules of the communal living of the community”, the scope of which is not further defined.53

---

49 For the definition of Ordenanzas see Article 54 n° 1 of the Ley Orgánica del Poder Público Municipal, G.O. no 38204 of 8 June 2005.
50 See, e.g., for tourism TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 826 of 16 May 2008, file n° 08-0479.
51 Article 57 in fine of the Ley Orgánica del Poder Público Municipal (note 49 above).
52 The possibility to create such Asamblea de Ciudadanos y Ciudadanas is mentioned in Article 70 of the Constitution as one of the “means of participation and protagonism of the people in the exercise of its sovereignty”, “whose decisions have binding character”. The proposed reform of the Constitution, rejected in the Referendum of 2 December 2008, would have added “as long as they do not contradict the Constitution and the laws”, which is probably the interpretation that has to be given to the present Article 70 anyway.
53 Article 6 n° 1 of the Ley de los Consejos Comunales, G.O. no 5.806 (extraordinaria) of 10 April 2006. “Community” is defined in Article 4 n° 1 as “the social conglomerate of families and citizens which live
Although these structures are supposed to allow self-governance of local communities and is therefore a potential source of diversity,\(^55\) it can be doubted that they will put into question the high degree of centralization of the country in view of the fact that these community structures are directly coordinated, supervised, and financed by Comisiones Presidenciales del Poder Popular – commissions appointed directly or indirectly by the President,\(^56\) without the participation of the states or the municipalities.\(^57\)

III. The Means and Methods of Legal Unification

In view of the above sketched centralization of virtually all relevant law-making activity as well as the weakness of federalism in the country’s history, legal unification is not an issue in Venezuela. The legal unification has been achieved exclusively through the central power of the federal government (top down). Attempts to decentralize the powers by transferring powers to the component states and municipalities have failed so far and have practically become obsolete. Voluntary coordination among component states or an impact of non-state actors on legal unification do not seem to have played a role and are rather unlikely to play one in the future in view of the tendencies to reduce federalism further more.

The curricula of the Venezuelan faculties of law, half of which are located in Caracas, are focused exclusively on federal law and are rather similar irrespective of their in a specific geographic area, which share a common history and interests, know each other and have relations with each other, use the same public utilities and share similar economic, social, urbanistic, and other necessities and potentials.”

\(^{54}\) It is worth noting that Article 6 n° 5 of the same law provide that Assembly of Citizens “exercises the social control”, Articles 9 and 16 of the Decreto con Rango, Valor y Fuerza de Ley Orgánica del Servicio de Policía y del Cuerpo de Policía Nacional, G.O. n° 5880 (extraordinario) del 9 April 2008 require the police only to inform and to consult the “communities”, the Consejos Comunales, or the other “communitarian” organs, without mentioning the municipalities. Furthermore, Articles 47-48 provides “communities” with the possibility to create their own police force “committed to the respect of values, identity and the own culture of each community”, with “the task to guarantee and ensure social peace, cohabitation, the exercise of rights and the fulfillment of the law.” The National Police Law has been declared constitutional by TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 385 of 15 March 2008, file n° 08-0233.

\(^{55}\) But see note 52 above in fine.

\(^{56}\) Articles 28 to 32 of the Ley de los Consejos Comunales (note 53 above).

In the absence of legislative diversity in Venezuela, legal education and training can be considered a factor that supports the centralization of the making and application of the law. The absence of legislative diversity also suggests that external factors are irrelevant for maintaining the high degree of centralization.

IV. Institutional and Social Background

1. The role of the judicial branch

   a. The role of the Supreme Tribunal

   The Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Tribunal of Justice (Sala Constitucional del Tribunal Supremo de Justicia) is the court with jurisdiction over all disputes over the constitutionality of acts resulting from the direct application of the Constitution and over all disputes between the central government, the states and the municipalities (“acción de resolución de conflictos entre órganos del Poder Público”) (Articles 266 n° 4 and 336 n° 9). However, the jurisdiction of this court has to be put into a larger political context created by the 1999 Constitution and subsequent laws which have put into question the impartiality of the court, which is today dominated by the followers of the President. It is therefore little surprising that conflicts over powers between the central government and the states are systematically decided to the detriment of the latter.

   The only known recent case in which the Supreme Tribunal effectively declared that a federal law violated the legislative powers of a state under the new constitution

---

58 For a list of, and internet links to, most of the law faculties in Venezuela see [http://www.ventanalegal.com/universidades.htm].
60 Other than the following examples, for the bias of the Supreme Tribunal in favor of the federal government see also A.R. Brewer-Carias, “El juez constitucional vs. la supremacía constitucional”, mimeo, available at [http://www.allanbrewercarias.com] on the systematic rejection of all constitutional actions against the reform of the Constitution, which was eventually rejected in the referendum of 2 December 2007.
concerns a case in which no federal interests were at stake. The presidential Decreto con fuerza de Ley General de Puertos of 2002, which provides, among other things, that the entities created by the states for the administration of commercial ports are obliged to transfer to the municipality in which the port is located 12.5% of their gross income. The Supreme Tribunal declared this provision unconstitutional, inter alia, because it would violate the states’ exclusive right to dispose of the “exploitation” of the ports according to Article 164 n° 10, and thus of the revenues obtained thereof.

Examples for the Tribunal’s bias in favor of the central government may be found in its refusal to hear cases in which the Central Government in 2003, after significant tensions between the President and states governed by the opposition had cut off payment of the constitutionally guaranteed share of the Situado Constitucional, the federal financial transfer to the states (Article 167 n° 4). The Tribunal justified its refusal by stating that the alleged lack of payment is merely a question of the application of ordinary law and therefore not of constitutional nature, thus forcing the states to restart their claims before the Administrative Chamber.

Another illustration is a case concerning the disarmament of the state police by the national armed forces after violent clashes between followers of the President and state police force. Inter alia, the National Armed Force, which are under the control of the President (Article 156 n° 8, 236 n° 5), confiscated in 2003 the assault rifles of the state police of Zulia, who had bought them in 2001 with the authorization of the federal Minister of the Interior and with federal funds for decentralization. The State of Zulia requested the Supreme Tribunal to declare that the action violated the State’s powers to organize the state police and to guarantee the protection of public order (Articles 164 n° 6 and 332(3)), justifying the need for armory with the fact that the central government 62 TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 2495 of 19 December 2006, file n° 02-0265, see also note 41 above.

63 See below Point IV.2.b.
64 TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 1682 of 18 September 2003, file n° 03-0207 (State of Monagas); and decision n° 1109 of 8 June 2004, file n° 03-0725 (State of Apure).
65 See TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 1140 of 9 June 2005, file n° 03-0969.
66 For the parallel case of the destitution of the head of the metropolitan police of Caracas by the Armed Forces see TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 3343 of 19 December 2002, file n° 02-2939.
had not yet established the national police as required by the 1999 Constitution.\(^{67}\) The Supreme Tribunal simply rejected the request with the argument that there was no conflict of power because the Armed Force has the powers to regulate the possession of “war weapons”, which a law of 1939 defines as “all those which are used or could be used by the Army, the National Guards and the other security agencies for the defense of the Nation and the protection of public order”, \(^{68}\) which effectively covers all type of weapons.

b. Component states’ law applied by courts

Since 1945 Venezuela has no state courts, since the judicial system falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the central government (Article 156 n° 31). The only exception is the justicia de paz, referred to a local system of judges for the conciliatory proceedings in neighborhoods, that fall under the jurisdiction of the municipalities (Articles 178 n° 8 and 285).

All courts have jurisdiction to interpret state laws just as any another law, which through the possible cassation recourses eventually leads to the Supreme Tribunal’s jurisdiction (sala de casación) to interpret them (Article 266 n° 8). The different chambers of the Supreme Tribunal can also decide on interpretative recourses regarding laws (Article 266 n° 6). These interpretations are, in principle, never authoritative. Formally, only the interpretations of constitutional provisions made by the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Tribunal (sala constitucional), who is the ultimate guarantor for the uniform interpretation and application of the constitution, are “binding on the other Chambers and the other courts of the Republic” (Article 335).\(^{69}\) Practically, however, the interpretations of national, state and municipal laws made by \(^{67}\) Transitional Provision 4 n° 9 of the Constitution, according to which this law should have been enacted within one year after the entry into force of the new Constitution. The Ley Orgánica del Servicio de Policía y del Cuerpo de Policía Nacional was only enacted in 2008 through a presidential decree, G.O. 5880 (extraordinario) of 9 April 2008.

\(^{68}\) Article 3 of the Ley de Armas y Explosivos, G.O. 19900 of 12 June 1939.

\(^{69}\) On this point see also A.R. Brewer-Carias, “Instrumentos de justicia constitucional en Venezuela (acción de inconstitucionalidad, controversia constitucional, protección constitucional frente a particulares)”, in: J. Vega Gómez & E. Corzo Sosa (eds.), Instrumentos de Tutela y Justicia Constitucional 75-99 (Mexico City 2002) the Supreme Tribunal de facto bind the lower instances due to the its authority and to the system of recourses.

The Constitutional Chamber, when deciding actions on unconstitutionality regarding laws (national, state and municipal) and regulations has the exclusive power to review and to annul with effects erga omnes any kind of legislation (Article 334(3)), including state law and municipal statutes (Article 336 n° 2). Lower courts may declare the unconstitutionality of national, states and municipal statutes and regulations in particular cases and controversies; but this will only have effect inter partes (Article 334(2)). In these latter cases, an extraordinary recourse for revision can be brought before the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Tribunal so as to obtain a binding interpretation of the Constitution on the question of constitutionality of the challenged legal provision (stare decisis principle) (Article 334(4)).

2. Relations between the central government and component states

   a. The component states and federal law

Although deprived of most exclusive legislative powers, the states are nevertheless declared politically “autonomous” (Article 159). Accordingly, the states cannot be forced to legislate by the central government, such as to enact “development laws” within the framework of central “basic laws” in matters of concurrent powers. So long as the states have not assumed their responsibility to legislate, the existing legislation will continue to apply, and, in case of lacunae, courts will apply federal law by way of analogy.

Central government law is applied not only by the central government specific federal agencies located and functioning in any part of the country, but also by the states and the municipalities when deciding on matters therein regulated.

---

70 See, e.g., TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 843 of 11 May 2004, file n° 03-1236, whereby a law by which the State of Guárico intended to decentralize to the municipalities more areas than provided for in Article 165(2) was annulled.

71 See Brewer-Carias (note 69 above) 84: “Accordingly, any interpretation by the Constitutional Chamber of any law or any other legal provision of the rank of a law or regulation does not have binding effect”.

Prior to 1999, Venezuela always disposed of a bicameral Congress, in whose federal chamber, the Senate, each state and the Federal District were represented by two directly elected senators, and additional ones representing minorities.\textsuperscript{73} The 1999 Constitution eliminated the Senate and, in consequence, components states and municipalities are not represented at the law-making at the central level. The component states influence on the central legislative process is, according to the Constitution, the National Assembly’s obligation to consult the States’ Legislative Council before passing laws on matters which could be of interest to the states (Article 206). Unfortunately this provision has been systematically ignored in practice.\textsuperscript{74}

Furthermore, the 1999 Constitution has created an intergovernmental entity called the Federal Council of Government for the purpose of planning and coordinating the policies and actions for the development of the decentralization process and transfer of powers from the central government to the components states and municipalities, headed by the Vice President of the Republic and integrated by Ministers, governors of the component states and one mayor from each component state, as well as of representatives of the civil society (Article 185). Nonetheless, such Council has never been convened or met.\textsuperscript{75}

\textbf{b. Public finances}

Virtually everything concerning the taxation system has been more centralized in the 1999 Constitution, so that the powers of the component states in tax matters have been basically eliminated. The Constitution lists in detail all the central government powers \textsuperscript{73} Article 148 of the 1961 Constitution.

\textsuperscript{74} The 2003 law on the reform of the 1989 Decentralization Law was allegedly never submitted to the States’ Legislative Council, see TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 1801 of 24 August 2004, file n° 04-0331; and decision n° 966 of 9 May 2006, file n° 04-0331 (recourse of nullity eventually rejected due to inactivity of the claimants for more than one year). See also the allegations made by the State of Carabobo in its action against the \textit{Decreto con Fuerza de Ley General de Puertos} (G.O. 37589 of 11 December 2002), which were rejected by the Supreme Tribunal with the argument that, in the meanwhile, the Decree had been substituted by a law, for which the states allegedly have been consulted; TSJ Sala Constitucional, decision n° 2495 of 19 December 2006, file n° 02-0265.
\textsuperscript{75} The Council’s virtual internet page <http://consejofederaldegobierno.org/> only contains general news. See also Penfold-Becerra (note 6 above) 220: “If this Federal Council is not properly regulated by the law, it could be used by the central government as a means to divide the governors through the political use of resources accumulated in [the Intergovernmental Fund for Decentralization].” See also Sánchez Meléan (note 28 above) 26.
with respect to basic taxes (income tax, inheritance and donation taxes, taxes on capital, production, value added, taxes on hydrocarbon resources and mines, taxes on the import and export of goods and services, and taxes on the consumption of liquor, alcohol, cigarettes and tobacco) (Article 156 n° 12), and also expressly attributes to the municipalities some taxation competencies with respect to local taxes (Article 179). In addition, as mentioned above, the Constitution gives to the national government (not to the states) residual competencies in tax matters (Article 156 n° 12). The Constitution does not grant the component states any power on matters of taxation, except with respect to official stationery and revenue stamps (Article 164 n° 7). Thus, the component states can only collect taxes when the National Assembly expressly transfers to them, by statute, specific taxation powers (Article 167 n° 5), which has never happened so far.

Therefore, lacking for their own resources from taxation, state financing is basically accomplished by the transfer of national financial resources through three different channels. First, it is done by means of the so-called Situado Constitucional, (Constitutional Contribution by the Federal Government) provided in the national Constitution, which is an annual amount within the National Budget Law equivalent to a minimum of 15% and a maximum of 20% of total ordinary national income, estimated annually (Article 167 n° 4). Second, a national law has established a system of special economic allotments for the benefit of those component states where mining and hydrocarbon projects are being developed. According to this statute, these benefits have also been extended to include other component states (Article 156 n° 16). And third, financing for states and municipalities also comes from national funds, such as the Intergovernmental Fund for Decentralization (FIDES), created in 1993 (Article 167 n° 6). The Constitution provides that this last fund, which should become the Interregional Compensation Fund, would be administered by the Federal Council of Government (Article 185(2) in fine); yet neither the law for creating the new Interregional

---

76 Ley de Asignaciones Económicas Especiales para los Estados y el Distrito Metropolitano de Caracas Derivadas de Minas y Hidrocarburos, G.O. 37086 of 27 November 2000; substituted by Ley de Asignaciones Económicas Especiales Derivadas de Minas y Hidrocarburos, G.O. 38408 of 29 March 2006.
Compensation Fund nor the law governing the Federal Council have yet been enacted.\textsuperscript{77} \textit{De facto}, the central government has repeatedly and over some period of time retarded the transfer payments, thus causing serious problems of financing to the states.\textsuperscript{78}

3. Other institutions for resolving intergovernmental conflicts

Except the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Tribunal of Justice, which has jurisdiction to resolve constitutional and administrative conflicts between the central government and the component states and the municipalities, and the still practically nonexistent Federal Council of Government, which is called to plan and coordinate policies and actions for the process of decentralization and transfer of competencies, there are no other institution (political, administrative, judicial) to help resolve conflicts between component states or between the central government and component states.

4. The role of bureaucracy

Even though national legislation on public servants has been enacted in 2002,\textsuperscript{79} which is applicable to the national, states and municipal civil servants, each level of government has its own civil service system. Thus, the civil service of the central government is separate from the civil services of the component states and of the municipalities. Being separate civil service systems, there is no formal lateral mobility (or career advancement) between them. Only for retirement purposes (pensions), which is a matter falling under exclusive federal jurisdiction,\textsuperscript{80} the length of time worked in any of the three levels of government counts for the purpose of retirement.

\textsuperscript{77} A Ley del Consejo Federal de Gobierno decided by the National Assembly has been vetoed by the President on 18 July 2005 due to the lack of a law governing the Interregional Compensation Fund, see <http://www.consejoslocales.org/modules.php?name=Forums&file=viewtopic&t=97>.

\textsuperscript{78} Sánchez Meléan (note 28 above) 28-2; see also text accompanying note 64 above.

\textsuperscript{79} Ley del Estatuto de la Función Pública (note 31 above).

\textsuperscript{80} Ley del Estatuto Sobre el Régimen de Jubilaciones y Pensiones de los Funcionarios o Empleados de la Administración Pública Nacional, de los Estados y de los Municipios, G.O. nº 38.501 of 16 August 2006; see also note 21 above.
5. Social factors

Venezuela is a multicultural and mixed (mestizo) country where no important racial, ethnic, religious, linguistic or other social cleavages in the federation exist. There is a very small population of indigenous peoples (approximately 1%), whose rights have been expressly recognized in the Constitution (Articles 119-126). The most important indigenous peoples group is located in the southern State of Amazonas, and its members have actively participated in the political process of the state and its municipalities. The Constitution also guarantees that in addition of the members of the National Assembly elected in each state, three separate members must be elected by the indigenous peoples (Article 186).

There are very significant asymmetry in natural resources, development, wealth and education between the component states. The main oil exploitation (the main source of income of Venezuela) is located in the State of Zulia, and the main mining exploitations in the State of Bolívar. Since the component states dependent from the national financial allocations, one of the factors established in the Constitution for the distribution of the resources from the Situado Constitucional is related to the population of each state. However, the Constitution allows the assignation of special economic advantages to the states in whose territory the natural resources are located (Article 156 n° 16).

Concluding remarks

Federalism has always been a most sensitive and controversial topic in Venezuela and accordingly has developed in a rather particular way, often described as “centralized federalism”. Already the Exposición de Motivos of the 1961 Constitution reflected the peculiarity of the Venezuelan conception of federalism:

“‘Federation’ in Venezuela, properly speaking, represents a peculiar form of life, a bundle of values and feelings that the Constituency is obliged to respect to the

---

81 See also note 73 above.
82 Ley de Asignaciones Económicas Especiales para los Estados Derivadas de Minas e Hidrocarburos (note 76 above).
83 See Brewer-Carías (note 39 above).
degree that the interests of the people allow. Therefore, the following definition has been adopted: ‘The Republic of Venezuela is a federal state in the terms established by this Constitution’… In other words, it is a federation to the degree and with the particular form in which this idea has been lived by the Venezuelan society.”

The decentralization process initiated in 1989 had brought about – probably for the first time – some new dynamism into the political landscape of Venezuela by granting new opportunities at state level to counterbalance the power of the central government. Yet the 1999 Constitution and especially the political evolution since 2002 have more or less dried out the buds of practical federalism created by the 1989 decentralization process. Some go as far as affirming that, de facto, Venezuela is no federation anymore.

As concerns the legislative powers, the finding that the component states of Venezuela do not have any significant legislative powers outside the restricted framework of federal laws also has to be put into the broader picture of legislative activity in Venezuela in general. In 2007, the National Assembly has voted, other than 62 approvals of treaties concluded by Venezuela with foreign countries, a total of 19 laws. The first of these laws was voted by unanimity; it empowers, in accordance with Article 203(4), the President for 18 months to regulate a significant number of matters

---

85 Sánchez Meléan (note 28 above) 27 (citing the President himself as having declared in his weekly television show “Aló Presidente” that Venezuela is a “unitary republic”); J. Biardeau R., “El proyecto de reforma y la destrucción del Estado Federal Descentralizado”, mimeo (20 October 2007), available at <http://www.aporrea.org/ideologia/a42897.html> (criticizing the planned reform of the Constitution [failed due to the negative referendum on 2 December 2007] as “not containing any elaboration of the principles of the decentralized federal State in the new geometry of power. Much is being said about popular power [poder popular], but the cruel reality is that it is born as an appendix of the national executive power and without any autonomy.” More optimistic in 2002 was Penfold-Becerra (note 6 above) 221: “Venezuela’s federal system might help counterbalance presidential power, continue to modify legislators’ behavior, and even undermine the coalition that keeps Chávez in power. It is still too early to tell the impact of federalism on the eventual shape of Venezuelan democracy, but evidence indicates that federalism remains a critical source of political change in the country.”

86 Serna de la Garza (note 45 above) 283.

by way of “decree with force of law”. Taking together with the broad legislative powers attributed to the central government, this means that the country is largely governed directly by the President through decree. All in all, the discussion of federalism in Venezuela is becoming more and more of rather hypothetical nature.

---

88 Ley que Autoriza al Presidente de la República para Dictar Decretos con Rango, Valor y Fuerza de Ley en las Materias que se Delegan, G.O. n° 38617 of 1 February 2007. Previously, the President had been given fast track powers for one year by the Ley Habilitante of 2000, G.O. 37077 of 14 November 2000.